

Tips for a Successful Interview

No matter how well qualified you are for a job, if you cannot make it through the interview, you will never be employed. There are several things that job seekers do unknowingly to thwart their own path. Make sure to use the tips below so that you present yourself in the best manner possible.

Hygiene is everything. When you go to an interview, you know you need to be dressed for the interview and not the job itself. Even if the job is a messy one, you want to go in looking your best. This shows your potential employer that you have some respect for the interview and are at least organized enough to have good hygiene. Make sure your hair is washed and that there is no dirt under your fingernails. This may seem silly, but these are the things that people notice. Take the time to brush your teeth as well and if you are still worried about your breath, chew a breath mint or piece of gum until you get to the building, and then spit it out or swallow it.

Make eye contact. People who do not make eye contact are perceived as people who have something to hide. You might just be nervous about the interview, but you do not want to look like you don't have the ability to look someone in the eye. While you are looking them in the eye, lean forward to give the impression that you are interested in what they have to say. If this is not possible, at least don't block with your body language. Avoid crossing your arms or fidgeting.

Always be thankful. Thank the interviewer for their time when the interview comes to an end. Let them know you look forward to hearing from them as if you assume you will. Workway is a great place to brush up on your interview skills and possibly land the job of your dreams.
